Suit for Recovery of Money, Damages and Interest Arising from Breach of Contract

Meera Engineering Supplies v. Northstar Buildwell Private Limited

Illustrative O.S. No. 142 of 2025 | Coimbatore District, Tamil Nadu

1. COVER AND CASE IDENTIFICATION

ILLUSTRATIVE CIVIL CASE FILE

Case: Meera Engineering Supplies v. Northstar Buildwell Private Limited

Illustrative case number: O.S. No. 142 of 2025

Illustrative court: Court of the Principal District Judge, Coimbatore District, Tamil Nadu

Case type: Civil suit for recovery of contractual dues, interest and costs arising from an alleged breach of a supply contract.

This 22-page dossier demonstrates the structure of a civil case file: background facts, pre-suit correspondence, plaint, written statement, issues, evidence, exhibits, arguments, judgment, decree and execution. It is intended for academic learning and case-file format practice.

Parties: Meera Engineering Supplies, a fictional sole proprietorship represented by Ms. Meera Raman, is the plaintiff. Northstar Buildwell Private Limited, a fictional construction company, is the defendant. The dispute concerns electrical panels and related components supplied for a commercial building project.

Claim amount: ₹18,40,000 as alleged unpaid principal, together with interest and costs. All names, dates, figures, pleadings, exhibits and findings are fictional. This is not an official court record, a real judgment, or a filing-ready legal document.

Important: All names, dates, amounts, documents, proceedings and findings are fictional and for academic illustration only.

2. EXECUTIVE SUMMARY AND CASE CLASSIFICATION

This is a civil contractual-payment dispute. The plaintiff says it supplied electrical panels and components under a purchase order, issued invoices after delivery, and received only part of the price. The defendant admits the commercial transaction and part-payments but disputes the full amount, alleging delay and defects in some goods.

The main questions are whether a binding contract existed, whether the plaintiff performed its obligations, whether delivery and acceptance are proved, how much remains unpaid, whether a lawful set-off is established, and whether interest and costs should be awarded. Each question requires separate consideration of the contract and evidence.

The plaintiff seeks a money decree for ■18,40,000, interest and costs. The defendant seeks dismissal or reduction of the claim to account for alleged defective or late supplies. The illustrative outcome later in this file favours the plaintiff on the principal claim because the defendant's proposed deduction is assumed not to be adequately proved.

This is not a criminal case. The primary relief is a civil money decree, not punishment for an offence. A contractual dispute, even where one party alleges poor performance, does not automatically establish fraud or any other criminal offence. Any criminal issue would require separate facts, legal elements and proper proceedings.

3. PARTIES, JURISDICTION AND RELIEFS

The plaintiff, Meera Engineering Supplies, is described as a proprietorship dealing in industrial electrical goods. Ms. Meera Raman is assumed to have personal knowledge of the negotiations, invoices, delivery records, account ledger and payment reminders. Her authority and the business records would need to be proved in an actual proceeding.

The defendant, Northstar Buildwell Private Limited, is described as a construction company that ordered goods for a project in Coimbatore. Its correct legal name, registered office, corporate status and the authority of the person representing it must be verified from actual records in a real case.

For this fictional example, the purchase order was accepted at the plaintiff's Coimbatore office and part of the delivery and inspection occurred in Coimbatore. These facts illustrate how a plaintiff pleads territorial jurisdiction. A real court's jurisdiction depends on the actual contract, place of performance, defendant's location and applicable law.

The plaintiff seeks: (1) ₹18,40,000 as unpaid principal; (2) pre-suit, pendente lite and post-decree interest as legally justified; (3) costs; and (4) any further relief the court considers proper. Suit valuation, court fee and pecuniary jurisdiction must be calculated under current law and cannot be inferred from this fictional example.

4. FACTUAL BACKGROUND OF THE TRANSACTION

In January 2024, Northstar Buildwell was developing a commercial building and required electrical distribution panels, circuit-protection equipment, control components and accessories. Its project manager contacted Meera Engineering Supplies for a quotation covering item descriptions, quantities, prices, taxes, delivery terms and warranty conditions.

On 18 January 2024, the defendant allegedly issued Purchase Order No. NB/EL/024/118 for goods valued at ■24,60,000. The order required staged delivery to the project site and payment within 30 days of delivery and verification. The plaintiff says it accepted the purchase order by email and began procurement.

The plaintiff says three consignments were delivered between February and March 2024. Each consignment was accompanied by a delivery challan and tax invoice, and a person at the defendant's site signed the delivery record. The defendant later argued that those signatures acknowledged physical receipt only and did not amount to technical acceptance.

The defendant paid ■6,20,000. The plaintiff calculates the remaining principal as ■24,60,000 minus ■6,20,000, or ■18,40,000. The defendant alleges delay and defects in some items. The court must distinguish proof of delivery from proof of conformity, and distinguish an unpaid invoice from proof that every claimed amount is recoverable.

5. PRE-SUIT DEMANDS AND CORRESPONDENCE

The plaintiff says it sent account statements and reminders on 15 April, 10 May and 3 June 2024. The reminders identified the invoices, payments received and outstanding balance. The defendant allegedly replied that payment would be processed after project-team certification, but the full balance was not paid.

On 20 June 2024, the plaintiff issued a formal demand notice through its advocate. It referred to the purchase order, delivery records, invoices and part-payments, demanded ■18,40,000 within 15 days, and reserved the right to seek interest and costs. It invited the defendant to identify any invoice-specific objection and provide supporting records.

The defendant's advocate replied on 4 July 2024. The reply disputed full liability and alleged late delivery of two panels and defects in some components. It stated that the defendant had incurred site-coordination expenses and would not release the entire balance until the alleged issues were assessed.

The plaintiff responded on 12 July 2024, denying the defects and requesting inspection reports, photographs, site records and proof of repair expenses. It offered a joint inspection without prejudice to its claim. The parties did not settle. These letters may show the timing and nature of the dispute, but the statements in them are not automatically proof that the allegations are true.

6. PLAINT — MATERIAL FACTS AND CAUSE OF ACTION

Draft plaintiff summary: The plaintiff states that it carries on business as Meera Engineering Supplies through proprietor Ms. Meera Raman. The defendant ordered electrical goods for its Coimbatore project under Purchase Order No. NB/EL/024/118 dated 18 January 2024, following a quotation and email acceptance.

The plaintiff pleads that it delivered the goods in three consignments supported by Delivery Challans DC/041, DC/057 and DC/063 and Tax Invoices MES/2024/041, MES/2024/057 and MES/2024/063. The pleaded invoice total is ■24,60,000. After crediting payments of ■6,20,000, the plaintiff claims an unpaid balance of ■18,40,000.

The plaintiff alleges that payment became due under the 30-day term and that the defendant failed to pay despite reminders and a formal demand. It denies receiving a valid and timely rejection notice supported by a detailed inspection report. It also alleges that the defendant retained, installed or used the goods.

The cause of action is pleaded as arising when payment fell due, continuing when the defendant failed to pay, and becoming clearer when the demand remained unsatisfied. The plaint should state material facts, identify the contractual terms relied on, specify the amount claimed, explain jurisdiction and limitation, and list the documents relied upon.

7. PLAINT — PRAYER, VALUATION AND VERIFICATION

Illustrative prayer: The plaintiff asks for a decree directing the defendant to pay ■18,40,000 as unpaid principal, together with such pre-suit, pendente lite and post-decree interest as the court finds legally justified, costs of the suit, and any further relief the court considers appropriate.

The plaintiff values the recovery claim at ■18,40,000 for the relevant procedural purposes, subject to the applicable valuation rules and treatment of interest. Court fee must be calculated under the relevant Tamil Nadu legislation. The amount used for court fee, the amount used for pecuniary jurisdiction and the treatment of accrued interest may require separate analysis.

Documents relied upon include the quotation, purchase order, acceptance email, delivery challans, tax invoices, ledger, bank statements, reminders, demand notice, advocate's reply and any inspection or warranty records. Each document should be identified and linked to the fact it is intended to prove. Originals should be preserved wherever available.

Verification specimen: "I, Meera Raman, proprietor of the plaintiff concern, verify that the factual statements concerning the transaction, delivery, invoices, payments and correspondence are true to my knowledge and business records, and that the legal submissions are based on advice received and believed to be correct." Actual verification must comply with applicable procedural rules.

A plaint should plead material facts rather than every item of evidence or every legal argument. The pleading must be signed and verified by a competent person and accompanied by required documents, valuation details, court fee and procedural filings. This specimen requires adaptation and legal review before any real use.

8. WRITTEN STATEMENT OF THE DEFENDANT

The defendant admits issuing a purchase order but denies that the plaintiff fully performed every contractual obligation. It says the delivery schedule was important because electrical installation was linked to inspection and handover milestones. It alleges that two panels arrived late and some components needed correction before installation.

The defendant admits payments totalling █6,20,000 but denies that █18,40,000 is automatically payable. It argues that the invoices must be read with the purchase order, delivery conditions, inspection provisions and warranty terms. It denies that physical receipt alone proves final acceptance of every item in proper working condition.

The defendant says site staff signed delivery challans only to acknowledge receipt and lacked authority to certify technical conformity. It relies on internal emails and a site note said to record installation issues. It alleges that the plaintiff was informed and failed to complete corrective work within a reasonable time.

The defendant disputes the interest calculation and says the plaintiff has not established a contractual basis for the full rate claimed. It asks the court to dismiss the suit or, alternatively, determine the value of any proven defects or delay loss and award only the net sum, if any, remaining payable.

A written statement should respond specifically to material allegations, identifying what is admitted, denied or not admitted. Any set-off or counterclaim should be properly pleaded, quantified and supported. A broad denial or an unparticularised allegation of defects may not be sufficient to establish a defence.

9. PLAINTIFF'S REPLICATION AND REPLY

The plaintiff's illustrative replication states that the defendant admits the purchase order and part-payments, supporting the existence of the transaction. The plaintiff denies that the defendant issued a timely, contractually compliant rejection of the goods and relies on delivery challans, invoices and emails to establish delivery and the unpaid balance.

The plaintiff argues that the contract required discrepancies to be recorded within a stated inspection period and says no joint inspection report or item-by-item rejection was produced. It disputes the claim that delivery signatures were limited to physical receipt and asks the defendant to prove the authority and context of the signatories.

On delay, the plaintiff argues that the defendant must prove the agreed date for each item and show that any delay was caused by the plaintiff rather than site readiness, changes, access restrictions or other project events. It denies liability for repair expenses and asks for proof of the defect, notice, opportunity to rectify, actual expenditure and causal connection.

The plaintiff maintains that interest is justified because the defendant retained the benefit of the goods while withholding payment. It accepts that the rate and period must be determined under the contract and applicable law. It repeats its request for the principal balance, reasonable interest and costs.

A replication is not automatically required or permitted in every suit. Whether it may be filed depends on the pleadings, court directions and applicable procedure. It should answer new matters without introducing a new cause of action or silently changing the original claim.

10. ISSUES FRAMED FOR TRIAL

After reviewing the pleadings, the fictional court frames issues to identify the questions of fact and law requiring decision. Issues guide the evidence and final submissions; they are not findings and do not mean that either party has already succeeded.

Issue 1: Whether the plaintiff proves a binding contract under Purchase Order No. NB/EL/024/118 dated 18 January 2024, including the payment, delivery and inspection terms pleaded.

Issue 2: Whether the plaintiff proves delivery of the goods covered by the three invoices and whether the defendant accepted, used or retained them, subject to any properly established defect or non-conformity.

Issue 3: Whether ■18,40,000 remains due after crediting payments, and whether the defendant has proved a legally and factually available deduction, set-off or counterclaim.

Issue 4: Whether the plaintiff is entitled to pre-suit, pendente lite or post-decree interest, and if so, at what rate, on what amount and for what period.

Issue 5: Whether the court has territorial and pecuniary jurisdiction and whether the suit is within limitation, properly valued and accompanied by the required court fee.

Issue 6: What decree or other relief should be granted, and which party should bear costs? The plaintiff must prove the contract, performance and amount claimed. The defendant must substantiate affirmative defences and any alleged loss or deduction it relies upon.

11. PLAINTIFF'S EVIDENCE AND WITNESS STATEMENT

The plaintiff proposes to examine Ms. Meera Raman as PW-1. She states that she negotiated the transaction, issued the quotation, received the purchase order, arranged supply and maintained the business ledger. Her evidence identifies the purchase order, invoices, delivery challans, bank records and correspondence, and explains how the outstanding amount was calculated.

PW-1 states that the goods were delivered in three consignments and the delivery challans bear signatures of persons at the defendant's project site. She says no detailed formal rejection was issued within the contractual inspection period and denies that the plaintiff abandoned its obligations or refused a reasonable request for correction.

A witness should explain how documents were created, kept and sent, identify signatories where possible, and distinguish personal knowledge from information received from others. If the witness did not personally inspect every panel or cannot identify a signature, the witness should say so rather than speculate.

During cross-examination, the defendant may ask whether delivery dates matched the schedule, whether testing certificates were required, whether the plaintiff personally inspected the goods, whether any item was returned and whether the plaintiff replaced any component. The witness may also be asked to explain differences between invoice dates, delivery dates and ledger entries.

The plaintiff may call a delivery coordinator or accounts employee with relevant direct knowledge. Witnesses should be called for a clear evidentiary purpose. Business records must be connected to the transaction, and electronic records must satisfy applicable evidentiary requirements.

12. DEFENDANT'S EVIDENCE AND WITNESS STATEMENT

The defendant proposes to examine its project manager, Mr. Arjun Nair, as DW-1. He states that he coordinated installation and communicated with the plaintiff about delivery and performance. He says two panels arrived later than expected and some components required adjustment before installation could proceed.

DW-1 explains that delivery signatures acknowledged physical receipt rather than technical acceptance. The defendant relies on project emails, an internal site note and a technician's record. It argues that the invoice balance should be reduced by the reasonable and proven cost of correcting non-conforming items, if the court finds the defects attributable to the plaintiff.

In cross-examination, the plaintiff may ask DW-1 to identify the contractual delivery date for each item, when the plaintiff was notified, who prepared the site note, whether there was a joint inspection, whether repair costs were actually paid, and whether the defendant installed or used the goods. These questions test notice, causation, mitigation and the evidentiary basis of any deduction.

The defendant must connect each alleged defect or delay to a contractual obligation and measurable loss. A general statement that the project was delayed does not necessarily prove that the plaintiff caused the delay. The evidence should identify the affected item, agreed deadline, actual event, notice, and expense said to follow.

If the defendant seeks an affirmative monetary award for its own losses, it must consider the proper procedural route for a counterclaim or separate suit. A defence that reduces the plaintiff's claim is not always equivalent to a counterclaim seeking a separate award.

13. DOCUMENTARY EXHIBITS AND EVIDENCE REGISTER

The exhibit register below is illustrative. Exhibit labels are placeholders and do not mean that a court has formally admitted the documents. A document being marked as an exhibit does not automatically prove every statement in it. Authenticity, execution, contents, relevance and admissibility may still need to be established.

P-1: Quotation dated 12 January 2024 — offered price, specifications and proposed terms.

P-2: Purchase Order NB/EL/024/118 — order, quantities, delivery and payment terms.

P-3: Email acceptance — supports contract formation.

P-4 to P-6: Delivery challans DC/041, DC/057 and DC/063 — support delivery and receipt.

P-7 to P-9: Tax invoices MES/2024/041, MES/2024/057 and MES/2024/063 — support invoice value and due dates.

P-10: Account ledger — records invoices, credits and claimed balance.

P-11: Bank statements — confirm payments credited.

P-12 to P-14: Reminder emails and demand notice — show demand and contemporaneous dispute.

D-1: Defendant's reply notice — identifies objections.

D-2: Internal site note — may support the defendant's account of alleged defects, subject to proof.

D-3: Repair invoice or technician record — may support repair costs if causation and payment are established.

The ledger should reconcile with source invoices and payment entries. If an email or spreadsheet is disputed, the party should preserve original data and comply with applicable evidence requirements. A summary may assist the court only if it can be traced to underlying records.

14. CROSS-EXAMINATION AND EVIDENTIARY QUESTIONS

Cross-examination tests the accuracy, completeness and reliability of a witness's account. It may reveal whether the witness has direct knowledge, whether a document was created contemporaneously, whether an important qualification was omitted, or whether testimony conflicts with other records. Questions should be relevant to the issues rather than designed merely to embarrass.

Questions for PW-1 may include: Who negotiated delivery dates? Was there a signed inspection certificate? Did the defendant report a defect before the demand notice? Did the plaintiff replace any component? How was the ledger prepared? Can the witness identify the delivery signatories? Were any items returned? These questions test contract terms, performance, acceptance and amount due.

Questions for DW-1 may include: Was the site ready on each scheduled date? Which panel was late? What was its agreed delivery date? When was the plaintiff notified? Who prepared the internal site note? Was a joint inspection offered? Were repair costs paid? Did the defendant install or use the goods? These questions test causation, notice, mitigation and any proposed deduction.

The court should distinguish records created during ordinary business from documents prepared after litigation became likely. Neither category is automatically conclusive, but timing and purpose may affect weight. The court should assess whether a witness's account is corroborated by independent records and whether any inconsistencies can be reasonably explained.

A witness who does not remember a detail is not necessarily dishonest. Equally, a confident oral account does not eliminate the need to reconcile objective records. The court evaluates the whole evidence, including admissions, contractual wording, contemporaneous correspondence and the probabilities arising from proved facts.

15. LEGAL FRAMEWORK AND PRINCIPLES

A civil contractual recovery claim generally requires proof of a legally enforceable agreement, the plaintiff's performance or legally sufficient tender of performance, the defendant's obligation to pay, breach through non-payment, and the amount recoverable. Contract terms may be contained in a signed agreement, purchase order, accepted quotation, emails or a combination of documents.

The Indian Contract Act, 1872 contains general principles concerning agreements, performance, breach and compensation. The Sale of Goods Act, 1930 may be relevant to sale of movable goods, including delivery, conditions, warranties and acceptance. The Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 governs important procedural matters such as pleadings, trial, judgment, decree and execution. The Limitation Act, 1963 may determine whether the claim was filed in time.

The exact legal provisions depend on the transaction and relief pleaded. A real case requires analysis of the purchase order, parties' status, type of goods, contract terms, accrual of the right to sue and any special statute. Current amendments and local court rules must be checked.

The plaintiff must prove the amount claimed. A court may find that a contract existed but that the entire invoice balance is not recoverable. Conversely, the defendant's allegation of defective goods does not automatically extinguish the price obligation. The court must decide whether the defence is supported by the contract and evidence and whether any deduction or counterclaim was properly raised.

Interest is separate from principal liability. It may depend on an express contractual term, statute or judicial discretion under applicable law. The court should identify the principal, rate, start date and period. A rate stated in a demand letter is not automatically binding or necessarily awarded.

16. LIMITATION, COURT FEE AND PROCEDURAL COMPLIANCE

Limitation is a threshold question in a civil money suit. The court identifies when the cause of action accrued, which limitation period applies, whether any acknowledgment or part-payment affects calculation, and whether the suit was instituted within the prescribed time. Exact dates must be proved; an assertion that the debt remains unpaid does not by itself resolve limitation.

In this fictional file, invoices became payable during 2024 and the suit is assumed to have been filed in 2025. These dates illustrate a relatively prompt filing but do not establish the limitation result for any real dispute. Different instruments, contractual arrangements and statutory regimes may produce different outcomes.

Court fee and suit valuation must be calculated under applicable Tamil Nadu law and procedural requirements. The plaint should state the relief and valuation transparently. A shortfall in court fee may require correction, and incorrect valuation may raise jurisdictional questions. This file does not calculate a filing fee and should not be used as a fee assessment.

Other procedural checks may include authority to sue, the defendant company's correct legal name and registered office, service of summons, authorisation of company representatives, filing and disclosure of documents, verification of pleadings, and compliance with court directions. If the matter falls within a special commercial-court regime, additional disclosure and case-management requirements may apply.

The parties should also check whether a pre-institution mediation requirement applies, subject to the relevant statute and exceptions. A demand notice does not necessarily satisfy every pre-suit requirement. The correct answer depends on the classification of the suit, relief sought, current law and actual procedural history.

17. PLAINTIFF'S FINAL WRITTEN SUBMISSIONS

The plaintiff submits that the purchase order and acceptance email establish the contract. The invoices correspond to the goods ordered, delivery challans show that the consignments reached the defendant's site, and the defendant's admitted payments support the existence of the transaction. The plaintiff argues that the documents, read together, establish the balance of ■18,40,000.

The plaintiff says the defendant's defect allegations are general and insufficiently particularised. It points to the absence of a timely joint inspection report, an item-by-item rejection notice or independent technical evidence quantifying non-conformity. It submits that an internal note should be assessed cautiously unless its author, date, method and factual basis are established.

On delay, the plaintiff submits that the defendant must prove the agreed delivery deadline for each item and show that the plaintiff caused the delay. Site readiness, changes, access restrictions or other project events may have affected the schedule. The plaintiff argues that no broad deduction should be made without proof of causation and measurable loss.

The plaintiff seeks the principal sum, reasonable interest and costs. It argues that the defendant retained the benefit of the supplies while withholding payment. Interest should be determined by the proven contract and applicable law rather than automatically accepting the rate in the demand notice.

The plaintiff's strongest point is the documentary chain from purchase order to delivery, invoice, payment credits and ledger. Its principal risk is whether delivery records prove conformity and whether the defendant's objections were timely and specific. The court should decide these matters from the evidence rather than assume that an invoice or denial is conclusive.

18. DEFENDANT'S FINAL WRITTEN SUBMISSIONS

The defendant submits that the plaintiff must prove performance as agreed, not merely show that goods reached the site. It argues that the purchase order incorporated technical specifications and a delivery schedule and that conformity and timing were material to the project. The court should read the invoices with the purchase order and inspection provisions.

The defendant contends that delivery challans establish physical receipt but not necessarily technical acceptance. It relies on the project manager's testimony and the internal site note to support the claim that certain items required correction. It argues that evidence prepared by the defendant should not be disregarded merely because it originated internally.

The defendant says that if the plaintiff failed to meet agreed specifications, the court should consider the contractual consequences and any properly pleaded set-off or counterclaim. It accepts that any deduction must be supported by evidence but argues that the plaintiff should not receive the entire claimed amount without assessment of proven defects and delay.

On interest, the defendant argues that the plaintiff has not shown a contractual basis for the full rate claimed. Interest should be limited to a rate and period justified by the contract or applicable law and should not be calculated on sums found not to have been due. Costs should reflect the outcome of each issue.

The defendant's strongest point is that delivery and invoicing do not necessarily settle quality, acceptance or conformity. Its principal risk is whether defects, notice, causation and repair costs are sufficiently proved. If internal records lack technical support or expenses were never incurred, the defence may not justify a substantial reduction.

19. COURT'S ANALYSIS OF THE ISSUES

On Issue 1, the illustrative court finds that the purchase order, acceptance email and subsequent conduct establish a contract. The defendant's admission that it issued the order and made part-payments supports that conclusion. The court interprets payment and inspection terms by reading the purchase order as a whole.

On Issue 2, the court finds that the delivery challans and testimony support delivery of the three consignments. The signatures are evidence of receipt, but their significance depends on the contractual inspection terms. The court considers whether the defendant's records prove that particular items failed to conform and whether notice and opportunity to rectify were given.

On Issue 3, the court reconciles the invoice total of ■24,60,000 with payments of ■6,20,000. The resulting balance is ■18,40,000. In this hypothetical outcome, the defendant has not sufficiently proved a quantified set-off because the repair records do not reliably connect each expense to a defect attributable to the plaintiff.

On Issue 4, the court treats interest separately from principal liability. It considers the contract, due dates, demand history and applicable law. For illustration only, it awards interest at a moderate rate rather than automatically accepting the rate requested in the demand notice.

On Issue 5, the court accepts jurisdiction and limitation only on the assumed facts: the transaction has a sufficient territorial connection, the claim falls within the selected court's competence, and the suit was filed within the applicable period. A real court would require the actual pleadings and evidence before reaching these conclusions.

20. ILLUSTRATIVE JUDGMENT AND DECREE

Illustrative judgment — fictional outcome only. Having considered the pleadings, testimony, documentary exhibits and submissions, the court holds that the plaintiff has proved the supply contract, delivery of the goods and the unpaid principal balance. The defendant's allegations of defects and delay have been considered, but the evidence in this hypothetical record does not establish a sufficiently particularised and quantified set-off.

The suit is decreed in favour of the plaintiff for ■18,40,000. For this educational example, interest is awarded at 6% per annum on the principal from institution of the suit until decree and thereafter at 6% per annum until realisation, subject to the governing law and the terms of the formal decree. These rates demonstrate how a judgment may state the amount, rate and period; they are not a prediction of a real court's decision.

The defendant shall pay the decretal amount within the period specified in the formal decree. If payment is not made, the plaintiff may seek execution in accordance with the Code of Civil Procedure and applicable rules. Costs are awarded to the plaintiff in this fictional outcome. No criminal finding is made because this proceeding concerns civil contractual relief.

The judgment rests on the assumed evidence described in this file. A different purchase order, a valid limitation defence, proof of substantial defects, an established counterclaim, lack of jurisdiction or unreliable delivery records could change the result. A real decision must follow the evidence admitted and the law applicable to the actual transaction.

Model order: The suit is decreed for ■18,40,000 with interest as specified above and costs. The defendant's unproved claim for a quantified set-off is rejected in this hypothetical example. Draw the decree accordingly. This is a model order only, not an authentic judicial pronouncement.

21. POST-JUDGMENT AND EXECUTION

A judgment gives the court's reasons and conclusions; the decree formally expresses the adjudication and relief granted. It should correctly identify the parties, amount payable, interest terms, costs and any directions. Parties should review the formal decree for clerical or computational errors and use the proper procedure if correction or clarification is needed.

After a money decree, the judgment-debtor may pay voluntarily, seek an available appellate remedy or take other steps permitted by law. The decree-holder should not assume payment will occur automatically. If the decree remains unsatisfied, execution may be sought before the competent court, subject to limitation and procedural requirements.

Depending on the facts and law, execution may involve identifying attachable assets, seeking attachment of property, using permitted procedures to obtain asset information or pursuing another lawful mode of execution. The available relief depends on the decree and circumstances. A creditor cannot seize property privately or use coercive methods outside lawful process.

The parties should maintain a clear calculation of principal, accrued interest, costs, payments after judgment and the remaining balance. All payments must be credited to prevent double recovery. If an appeal or stay order affects execution, its terms must be checked. An appeal does not always automatically stay enforcement; the actual order and applicable law govern.

The case file should record the decree, service, payments, execution filings and satisfaction, where applicable. This stage shows that litigation does not necessarily end on the date judgment is pronounced. The practical objective is lawful satisfaction of the decree while preserving the procedural rights of both parties.

22. CASE ANALYSIS, LEARNING POINTS AND CHECKLIST

The dispute illustrates the importance of a coherent evidentiary chain. The purchase order helps prove the agreement; delivery challans support delivery; invoices quantify the price; bank records establish credits; and correspondence shows the parties' positions before suit. No single document necessarily proves the entire claim. The court assesses how documents fit together and whether witnesses can explain them.

The case also demonstrates the difference between a defence and a counterclaim. A defendant may argue that the plaintiff has not proved the full amount or that a contractual deduction applies. If the defendant seeks an affirmative award for its own losses, the proper procedural route and pleading requirements must be considered. A general allegation of project delay is not proof of breach, causation and loss.

Key learning points: plead material facts clearly; identify exact contract terms; reconcile invoices and payments; preserve original records and electronic communications; respond specifically to defect allegations; prove the basis and calculation of interest; check jurisdiction, limitation and court fee; distinguish allegations from findings; and ensure that the decree accurately records the relief granted.

Pre-filing checklist: Are the correct parties named? Is authority to sue established? Is the purchase order complete? Are invoices and delivery records available? Are payments credited? Are demand and reply preserved? Is the claim within limitation? Is the correct court selected? Has court fee been calculated under current law? Are all relevant documents disclosed and electronic records preserved?

Final classification: This is an illustrative civil contractual recovery case involving supply of goods, unpaid invoices, disputed performance, interest and costs. All names, amounts, dates, exhibits, findings and the judgment are fictional. It is for academic study of civil case-file structure, not legal advice, a certified court document or evidence that a real case was decided this way.
